

U.S.-China Relations: After the 2016 Presidential Election

Presented by The Carter Center & Georgia China Alliance

Come November, we will know who our new president will be for the next four years. Both the Republican and Democratic party nominees have expressed strong views on free trade, trade agreements and China. What will U.S.-China relations look like in the next four years? Join us for a panel discussion on the upcoming 2016 U.S. presidential election and its potential impact on U.S.-China relations. Our panelists will share their views of both the Democratic and Republican party nominees' positions on China, and what will the U.S.-China relations look like under either a Clinton administration or a Trump administration, and the impacts on businesses on both sides.

Panelists:

Dr. Alan Abramowitz - Professor of Political Science, Emory University

Christopher Chan - Partner at Sutherland Asbill & Brennan LLP

Dr. John Garver - Professor Emeritus at the School of International Affairs at Georgia Tech

Dr. Yawei Liu - Director at The Carter Center China Program
